This project has been undertaken with the generous support of the Gaylord and Dorothy Donnelley Foundation

The Calumet Nature Educators Database links two important lists. The first is a list of nature education providers in the Calumet region of Illinois and Indiana at the southern end of Lake Michigan. The second is a comprehensive list of the region's schools. The two lists are cross-referenced and mapped in order to answer crucial questions about nature education in the region:

- Is it possible to provide comprehensive lists of schools and nature education providers?
- Is it possible to see the range of nature education programs on a map?
- How well does nature programming cover the entire region?
- When the schools are linked to the nature education providers, are there sub-areas within the region that are well-served?
- Are there "gaps", where schools seem not to be accessing available programming?

This guide introduces the maps and tables that were created for the project. A separate technical appendix is provided.

Several important points must be remembered in using this information:

- The "usage" data is based on the 2005-2006 school year.
- The project began as an effort to serve participants in the Calumet Stewardship Initiative, a coalition of organizations working on nature education in Southeast Chicago and Northwest Indiana. (For more on CSI, see www.calumetstewardshipinitiative.org.) By adding other nature education providers to the list (through, for example, the Environmental Educators of the Southern Lake Michigan region, and the Chicago Wilderness coalition), this database becomes more comprehensive. School usage data was derived only from CSI members, however. The comprehensive nature of the database does suggest how future surveys of program use could be conducted.

- The prospect of serving the children of the Calumet region has been an ongoing project. This information has already been used by the Calumet Stewardship Initiative to strategically target a new set of schools for nature education programming.
- This information is placed on the web for the public’s use, subject to limitations described in the disclaimer below.
- More interactive searching and mapping features will be added in the future.
- The project to inventory and map schools and nature education providers was accompanied by a concerted effort to place more material relevant to environmental issues in the Calumet region online at Chicago State University’s Calumet Environmental Resource Center website. More than five hundred documents may now be accessed online at www.csu.edu/cerc/researchreports.htm .

Contents of the Calumet Nature Educator’s Database

The database contains twelve maps and two tables. All have been rendered in .pdf format. To open them, the user will need to have a recent version of Adobe Reader. This may be downloaded at <http://www.adobe.com/products/acrobat/readstep2.html> . One may then use Adobe Reader’s tools to print, save, and search the document.

The maps, technical appendix, and tables are included in this file. For convenience, the maps are also posted online as separate files. They include:

Overview of Maps and Tables

The tables provide a list and address information for over six hundred schools and fifty nature educators in the Calumet region. The region is rather generously defined as extending to southern Cook county and northern Lake and Porter counties as well as northwestern LaPorte county, as schools reaching this far out are served by nature education organizations.

The table of “nature educators” is mostly drawn from the member rolls of the Calumet Stewardship Initiative, Chicago Wilderness, and Environmental Educators of the Southern Lake Michigan Region, which are the key nature education coalitions in the region. An organization’s membership in one of these coalitions is shown by an “x” on the table. Several organizations provided lists of schools that their programs serve, which allows us to link schools to organizations on the table and in the maps.

The table of schools is drawn from public information sources described below. The table also indicates which of the nature education providing organizations a school utilized in 2005-2006. Both of these tables are provided here in .pdf format for ease of use; what is not provided is the combined “shapefile” that links both of them to each other and to a GIS.

One contribution of this project is to provide a reasonable base map for future work in investigating service provision. Both of the lists of schools and education providers have been “geo-coded”, which is to say that they have been converted to a map-able format. The ability to link a database to a map, and then to use this information for asking and answering good questions, is the essence of “geographical information systems”, or GIS. Background work in setting up the data and the GIS is discussed in the technical appendix.

The maps show a school landscape populated by intense clusters on the southeast side of Chicago (especially north and west of the gap where Lake Calumet is to be found), and the municipalities of southern Cook County, Illinois and northern, Lake, Porter, and LaPorte Counties in Indiana. Schools are lightly scattered across unincorporated areas, shown in the lightest shade of gray.

When the list of nature educators is mapped, it displays a cluster in southeast Chicago and in the Indiana Dunes region. The Calumet Stewardship Initiative membership tends to hug the state line, although there are two key members in the Dunes area. Chicago Wilderness members with an education focus are more evenly distributed across the region. The membership of Environmental Educators of the Southern Lake Michigan Region tends to focus in Indiana.

Several maps demonstrate the potential of a fully fledged database to answer questions about which areas are well-served by programs and in which areas there are gaps. Again, it is important to note that this database does not claim to comprehensively link schools to providers; rather, it links schools to a key selection of providers. But even with that, some important generalizations can be made. For example, the Field Museum’s program concentrates very heavily in the southeast side of Chicago, especially in six community areas. The Cook County Forest Preserve’s Sand Ridge Nature Center shows less of a clustering effect, with schools served by the Center being evenly distributed throughout southeast Chicago and the southern suburbs. The Indiana Dunes Environmental Learning Center serves schools scattered across the region, with a special concentration in Hammond. The Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore reaches further into Illinois than the Learning Center, and also shows a strong cluster of schools served in Valparaiso. Finally, the Association for the Wolf Lake Initiative works with schools that are aptly distributed in communities that surround the bi-state lake.

When the schools served by these particular organizations are plotted on the “K-12 School Participation in Selected Nature Programs” map, two major areas of strong linkage between nature education programming and schools stand out. The first is in the bi-state area of southeast Chicago and Hammond. The second is in Porter County, especially in the Dunes region. Once again, it is important to bear in mind that this is only a selection of schools/provider links, although these are definitely among the most important program providers in the region. Of these, it may be observed that there is a strong and understandable “neighborhood effect”, where Calumet region schools nearest to assets like downtown Chicago organizations and natural areas like Sand Ridge, Wolf Lake, and the Indiana Dunes have a locational advantage. This does continue to leave a set of schools unserved – at least by these particular organizations. The last map which shows this suggests that there are continuing opportunities for nature education providers to make new connections. Such opportunities are especially concentrated in Gary and in those parts of the city of Chicago where the Calumet Stewardship Initiative has not yet extended its reach.

Next Steps

Chicago State University’s Calumet Environmental Resource Center is now positioned to conduct a more comprehensive annual survey of nature education programming usage and to integrate that information into the database. A survey like this would permit a study of changes over time and to highlight ongoing challenges as well as successes.

As GIS technology continues to evolve, it will also be possible in the next few years to migrate the database and the map to a more interactive web mapping format.

The most important use of these tools is to help schools find nature education providers in their area, and to help nature education providers who are committed to a program of outreach, to truly find those children in the region who have yet to be exposed to the opportunity to learn in and about the region's natural environment.

Technical Appendix

Schools: In the last few years, more schools information has become available on the web. When this project began, school districts web sites were searched to put together lists of schools, but in the end, it became far easier to simply access the board of education sites for the respective states, <http://www.doe.state.in.us/publications/schooldirectory.html> and <http://www.isbe.net/research/htmls/directories.htm>. Such files still needed extensive preparation for inclusion in this database, as discussed below. It should also be pointed out that due to Chicago Public Schools reform efforts, a number of small schools may share the same site. These are treated as separate schools.

Nature education providers: The large Chicago Wilderness coalition held a meeting dedicated to Calumet regional issues in Hammond in March, 2005. In preparing for that meeting, Chicago Wilderness put together a list of member institutions with an interest in "Calumet projects". This list also indicated who had an interest in education-related projects. This became the basis of the nature provider list. Addresses and contact information were added to the list. Columns were added to indicate if an institution was also a participant in the Calumet Stewardship Initiative or the Environmental Educators of the Southern Lake Michigan Region. Calumet Stewardship Initiative membership was clarified after that group's strategic planning and re-organization activities in 2005-2006. A current list may be found at www.calumetstewardshipinitiative.org. Members from EESLMR were found at the website, www.eeinthregion.org. Since the present project was well underway, users should also know of its upgraded website, now the Northwest Indiana Teacher Training Hub at <http://teachertraininghub.org/workshops2.php>.

Some nature education providers operate multiple centers. For example, the Sand Ridge Nature Center is a unit of the Cook County Forest Preserve. The decision was made to list these facilities as separate entities, because the specific locations are important in this project where mapping is such an important component. The decision was made to include any Chicago Park District Park with a walking/biking/jogging trail in the Calumet area. Parks that listed "Nature Areas" and "Volunteer Nature Monitoring" opportunities were also added.

School Usage: A critical question in this project is, which nature providers served which schools? These data were made available by the organizations listed on the “Schools” table and in Maps 11 and 12: the Association for the Wolf Lake Initiative (AWLI); the BOLD Chicago/Calumet Is My Backyard program (BOLD/CIMBY); the Field Museum of Chicago’s Calumet Environmental Education Program (FMNH/CEEP); Friends of the Parks (FOTP); the Indiana Dunes Environmental Learning Center (IDELC); the Sand Ridge Nature Center of the Forest Preserve District of Cook County; and the National Park Service’s Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore (NPS/INDU).

Format: An early decision was made to use Microsoft Excel, because existing data tended to be in the format and it can readily be converted into a GIS. Nevertheless, significant reformatting of the data needed to be performed to make it GIS-ready. While schools and providers were each listed on separate sheets, they were also combined with schools as rows and providers as columns. This allowed the summary statistics seen in Maps 11 and 12 (number of programs accessed.)

GIS Processing: After importation into ArcGIS, the Educator’s Database was geocoded. ESRI Street Map USA 2003 was used in the geocoding process to convert the addresses into spatial data usable by ArcGIS. Preparing a good regional base map was an important outcome of the project. Shapefiles and coverages were obtained from ESRI, CMAP, and the U.S. Census Bureau. The map scale of approximately 1:300,000 was used to cover the region containing most of the schools served by nature education providers. Gray-scale shadings and white boundary lines were used on the final map layout to indicate key civil divisions and Chicago community areas. A design decision was made to not label individual places, and to let the outline of the City of Chicago indicate the state boundary line. A “little red schoolhouse” symbol was selected to highlight school locations; on Map 11 these were graduated to indicate greater program usage. Nature educators are indicated by a pine tree symbol.
